"Marijuana revenue is directed to various programs as outlined by law. The majority of marijuana tax revenues directed to K-12 education is distributed in the form of grant programs, including capital funding for school buildings. Some marijuana tax revenue is deposited in the State Public School Fund, which is one of the sources for the state share of total program funding through the School Finance Act."

of course i guess what i'm hopin gfor is a comment that says none of the money is earmarked for teacher salaries b/c.....

also...some $ goes into the State Public School fund, which in part goes toward the equalization dollars.
is that about $41mil into a fund of $38bil ?

Hey David,

As you know, the pot tax revenue distribution is dictated by statute and from the constitution and then based upon the individual allocation/distribution methods within each individual grant/program.
The distribution and history of how it panned out in legislation is explained on this webpage:

DPS does receive its share of the marijuana tax revenue:

Jeremy
Hope you're well.
As expected, so many people still ask, "What about all that pot money?" when the issue of the Denver Teachers strike comes up.
So, we're gonna write a shorty that takes that one head-on.

So....
From your world....why can't Denver use any of the marijuana tax money distributed through the funds allotted to Dept of Ed? (the discretionary stuff, that is)
